Postgraduate Certificate in Gender Justice***
Queen Margaret University and Scottish Women's Aid

This course draws on current developments in both feminist theory and queer theory, and explores the interactions and tensions between these intellectually. In particular the course explores the question of whether justice is possible for the gendered subject – does justice require gender equality or gender deconstruction? The implications for the pursuit of gender justice are explored in a variety of contexts, including public policy, international development, health care and activism. These debates are located within wider theoretical and practical contexts of social justice relating to class, 'race', disability and other structures of inequality or claims for justice.

This course is likely to attract interest from practitioners and activists in women's organisations and in the LGBT community as well as students and graduates with particular interest in these areas. It is likely to be of interest to people who have previously studied Gender Justice, Masculinities and Violence, also offered by Queen Margaret University and Scottish Women's Aid.

The four modules contained within the postgraduate certificate may also contribute to other higher degrees at Queen Margaret University, including the MSc in Gender and Social Justice, in collaboration with Scottish Women's Aid
